TEXT AADING THE YOUTH BY AIDING THE ELDERLY

- 1 Global aging is one of the greatest challenges of the twenty-first century. While policymakers around the world are rethinking how society can prepare for an increasing population of elderly people, senior citizens themselves can help turn aging from a challenge into an opportunity.
- 2 Africa's population is growing faster than any other continent on Earth. The United Nations (UN) predicts that by 2100, one in four people on the planet will live in Africa. Sub-Saharan Africa¹ is, by global standards, a region with 60 per cent of its population under the age of 25. 5
- 3 Africa's so-called 'youth bulge' has the potential to contribute to massive economic growth. One way of creating an opportunity for the continent's young people may be, ironically, to look in the other direction, to its elderly – and particularly to aging citizens like Novusumzi Masala. 10
- 4 In Novusumzi Masala's life, there are thirteen of everything – thirteen pairs of battered shoes scattered around her tiny two-bedroom house, thirteen bowls stacked high above her sink, thirteen stacks of homework to puzzle over every night. 15
- 5 The thirteen young lives that orbit around her are not her own children. Instead, at age 78, Masala is raising a baker's dozen of her grandchildren. 'This isn't how I pictured my old age,' she says, laughing, as a pair of toddlers scurry over her feet. 'But I keep up. This is my family – I could never say no to them.' 20
- 6 'There's often a perception that older people are vulnerable, frail, and irrelevant to what happens to young people, but we know that in reality the lives of older and younger people are closely linked – there is a skills and knowledge transfer that needs to happen for society to function,' says Isabella Aboderin, a senior research scientist at the African Population and Health Research Centre in Nairobi. 25
- 7 In South Africa, in particular, eight per cent of all children are being raised by their grandparents, according to Statistics South Africa. The United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) estimates that half of Africa's 132 million orphans live with their grandparents. 30

8	Grandparents are such an important source of child care and knowledge, that some South African youth centres often offer support for the elderly. For Joey Manane, who runs a Soweto-based youth organisation called IKUSASA LETHU, meaning 'Tomorrow is ours', the link between old and young is essential. He has come to consider providing support to elderly caregivers in his community a necessary part of his work to support young people.	35
9	Three mornings a week, when the youth finish breakfast and filter out of his centre to head to school, the local grannies begin trickling in, ready for a day of crafts, support groups, and sports. 'We have a very good granny soccer team,' he says.	40
10	'The logic behind having programmes for the elderly at a youth centre is simple,' he says. 'It makes our work with the youth so much easier if their 'gogos' (grannies) feel supported.' He estimates that about 60 per cent of the youth he works with are being raised by grandparents.	45
11	At the Masala's house, a young counsellor from IKUSASA LETHU named Angelina Majoro, also drops in once a week to check on Novusumzi and her grandchildren – who range in age from two to seventeen. Sometimes she assists with homework, meal preparation, or family budgeting. Other times, she just sits and listens to the granny's frustrations about raising thirteen children when her only source of income is a small grant from the government. She wishes they could move into a bigger home. 'It is helpful to talk so I do not bottle things up,' Masala says.	50
12	For the Masalas, however, there is little question of the essential connection between its younger and older members. On a recent morning, some of the older children presented their grandmother with a rap song they had written about their lives. 'It's a song about what we have been through and how, with the help of our grandmother, we have made something better from it,' says Ongezwa Masala, aged 15.'	55

TEXT CSKILLS FOR JOB SEEKERS IN THE 2020s

The new decade, beginning in 2020, has seen the pace of digital transformation increase. This transformation has changed the demands of the workplace.

Jason Wingard, dean of the School of Professional Studies at Columbia University, says that previous generations have had the same job for a long time. The younger generation needs to be able to change jobs more often as companies are hiring workers on a contract basis. Consequently, workers will have to be flexible and constantly adjust to new work environments.

Creativity is always highly prized. Companies will look for people who can work creatively. For example, people must be able to develop their own strategies to work alongside 'cobots,' which are robots that work with humans.

Sue Llewellyn, a social media expert from the United Kingdom, says that the ability to work with different people will become more valuable in order to relate to changing teams in the workplace. People who have interpersonal skills will be in demand by employers.

According to Jerome Glenn, executive director of the Millennium Project, those who are constantly keeping up with technological changes will be the ones to succeed in the workplace.

In the 2020s, showcasing oneself and one's skills online is what is needed to build one's professional brand. One must be competitive to stand out in an increasingly changing job market.

- 2 So how can you finally see your goals through? Its time you put your health back at the top of your priority list. As the years go by, you can no longer afford to neglect your body. If you do not start taking care of your diet at a young age, there are health risks later in life. 5
- 3 The morning school and work rush is always chaotic, so packing yourself an healthy lunchbox is probably the last thing on your mind. However, buying lunch every day is not only costly, but is also often unhealthy. 10
- 4 'Unfortunately, bad lunch choices are driven by the lack of control we have over what our bought meals contain, especially when it comes to their sugar content,' says Greig Jansen, founder and CEO of Pura Beverage Company. Pre-made wraps, sandwiches and even salads can all contain high levels of sugar. 15
